Why do we use dissertations & theses?

- Provide a comprehensive literature review on the topic, and an extensive bibliography for the topic
- Reveal emerging trends and emerging voices in a field of study
- Find references for writing your own paper
- Understand the research field and interest of a department or a graduate school
- Find the research topics that professors had advised

Thesis vs. Dissertation: Similarities

- Each is considered a final project and required to graduate.
- Both papers are given deadlines.
- Both are used to defend an argument.
- Written skills and analytical skills are required to complete both.
- Neither can be plagiarized!
- Work with a committee comprised of faculty members, advisors and similar professionals who guide the student's research and writing.

Thesis vs. Dissertation: Differences

- a thesis is for master's student
- a dissertation is for PhD student
- a thesis chooses a stance on an existing idea and defends it with analysis
- a dissertation requires new research
- a dissertation requires a hypothesis that is then proven
- a dissertation has a longer oral presentation component

The Differences in Context: Location Matters

- The United States
  - In the US, a thesis is performed by master's students, and a dissertation is written by PhD candidates.
- Europe
  - In Europe, the distinction between a thesis and dissertation becomes a little more cloudy. PhD programs may require a doctoral thesis to graduate. Then, as a part of a broader post-graduate research project, students may complete a dissertation.

Abstract	An inability to handle IT-related security incidents can have devastating effects on both organizations and society at large. The European Union Agency for Network and Information Security (ENISA) emphasizes that cyber-security incidents affecting critical information infrastructures may simultaneously create significant negative impacts for several countries, and when incidents strike, the primary business processes of many organizations may be jeopardized. For example, the Swedish civil contingencies agency, MSB, reported in 2011 that a major Swedish IT services provider caused an IT-related security incident which in turn created large operational disruptions for a number of public and private organizations in Sweden. The management of IT-related security incidents is therefore an important issue facing most organizations today. Such incidents may threaten the organization as a whole and are not purely an IT issue; when handling incidents, escalation to the correct individual or groups of individuals for decision making is very important, as the organization must react quickly. Consequently, the major research goal of this thesis is to examine if the ability of an organization to escalate IT-related security incidents can be modeled, measured and improved. To achieve this goal, an artifact that can be used within an organization to model and measure its capability to escalate IT-related security incidents was designed, implemented and tested. This artifact consists of a maturity model whose purpose is to measure the level of maturity of the various attributes identified as necessary for an organization to handle escalations. In this thesis, a design science approach is applied, and the research project is divided into three design cycles, with the artifact being gradually developed and evaluated in each cycle. Evaluations were performed via interviews with representatives of 13 different organizations, including both private and public entities, and five different surveys with 78 individual participants. The conclusions of the research are that the use of the proposed self-assessment artifact can allow organizations to predict their ability to handle the escalation of IT-related security incidents with improved certainty.

Abstract:

The present study is located within the framework of descriptive translation studies proposed by Toury (1995). Its main concern is the investigation of the treatment of cultural references, names and wordplay in the translation of children's literature into Arabic. The subject of the analysis covers three books from the famous series of Harry Potter by the English author J.K. Rowling and their published Arabic translations. Detailed analysis of Harry Potter and the Philosopher's Stone, Harry Potter and the Goblet of Fire, and Harry Potter and the Half-Blood Prince which are translated into Arabic by different translators is performed with the aim of uncovering the translation norms of each translator. The third book Harry Potter and the Half-Blood Prince was also translated by fans of Harry Potter in the Arab world. Comparisons between the official and fan TTs are also made. The analysis in Chapters five, six and seven shows that there is no clear coordination among the three official translators despite being commissioned by the same publishing House. While both of the translators of the Philosopher's Stone and the Goblet of Fire norms fluctuate between 'adequacy' and 'acceptability', the latter undertakes a distorting unstated abridgment of the original. The official translator of the Half-Blood Prince has the strongest norms among all with a clear tendency towards 'adequacy', while the fans lean more towards the pole of 'acceptability'.

Applied Epidemiology in Cardiovascular Disease and in COVID-19 in Queensland, Australia

Thesis - 2022

Summary

Between February 2017 and June 2021, I undertook the Master of Philosophy in Applied Epidemiology at the Australian National University. During this period, I was employed as a cardiologist at the Sunshine Coast University Hospital in Queensland Health. My thesis presents the results of the four required field research projects. Acute Public Health Problem: The ATHENA COVID-19 Study: Part 1 - data linkage study of outcomes in people diagnosed with COVID-19 in Queensland 1 January to 31 December 2020. Part 2: linkage of general practitioner (GP) data and consent-to-recontact. The aim of Part 1 was to describe health outcomes and investigate predictors of outcomes for all people diagnosed with COVID-19 in Queensland by linking COVID-19 notification, hospital, general practice and death registry data. The aim of Part 2 was to establish a readily available and ongoing resource for access to

Description	Other : type:text Other : The consolidation of initial social exchange, trade and politic regionally are to produce a combination between regional distributions in economic leverage and political alliance. The construction of regionalism in East Asia was initiated by the rapid connection in trade industry and financial sector. The escalating overseas investment within the region has encouraged the building of consciousness on regional cooperation. The almost instantaneous creation of ASEAN+3 in 1997 has opened more chances to regional advancement and creating more opportunities for feasible projects progressively. The idea to evolve ASEAN+3 into a more regional representative entity was never an easy task because East Asia is economically and politically crucial to political interests group. Not only seeking for better performance in economic sector, a triangular link among ASEAN, China and Taiwan is also tangled over diplomatic issues. Both China and Taiwan are recognized as two economic powers that have shown strong-will to improve the relationship while continuing to have connection with ASEAN in various opportunities. However, Taiwan was naturally omitted from international stage and also any governmental leads regional discussion due to China's insistence on "one China" policy.....

Photovoltaic energy is the most promising future energy source. Therefore, strong efforts are made to improve their price-to-efficiency ratio. New technologies and materials are being involved in the production, such as poly-crystalline materials rather than mono-crystalline silicon. Some of these materials are based on copperchalcopyrite with advantageous properties like directly tunable band gap, high absorption coefficients, low deposition temperatures, low-cost materials and capability of deposition on suitable materials.
